WEBSITE VISITOR COUNTRIES FOR 3 YEARS: 2017-2019

Different organizations list slightly different numbers for the total number of countries in the world today. The United Nations list 193 countries, with possibly 3 others. The Britannica website lists 196 countries in the world. Google Analytics, on the other hand, also includes a number of areas and islands in its "country lists", which are not strictly independent countries, so that Google's expanded number of "countries" is in the 240's.

All my website statistics are based on Google Analytics reports. One of my personal interests is to see from how many different countries and cities visitors to my website are coming. My interest here is based on "go you into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15).

I have now kept website statistics for the past 3 years, for 2017 - 2019.

In those 3 years there were 177,577 visitors from 185 countries in the Britannica list, and a further 30 additional areas, which are not independent "countries", but which are separately identified by Google Analytics. Together all those visitors came from 11,420 different towns and cities around the world.

There are only 11 countries in the Britannica list from which this site did not receive any visitors during the past 3 years. I will list those countries below.

In the lists below for each country and additional "non-country" area I have indicated in brackets the number of towns from which the website visitors in that country came. For example: the visitors from the United Kingdom came from 581 different cities/towns within the United Kingdom.

These numbers do not indicate the actual number of visitors from any town or country. Thus for Singapore, for example, there is only 1 town, but there were in fact 1,293 visitors from Singapore during the 3-year period under consideration. I mention this to show that there is no relationship between the number of towns from which visitors in any country came, and the actual number of visitors involved.

Apart from these 11 very small countries, which together account for about 0.5% of the world's population, the visitors to this website have truly come from "all the world", from over 11,000 different towns and cities and communities.
